The prompt questions on the left - or other self-assessment activities you may have done - may guide your reflection process. The most important competency that was addressed in the process of our project was the communication competency. Working with other classmates I haven't socialised with opened new opportunities to develop my communication skills. Listening to new ideas from my peers gave me a new perspective to the project and allowed our presentation to be more organised and thought out. Introducing new ideas and suggestions was an obstacle since being with a new group felt anxious at first, but as the project progressed, the more comfortable I felt in sharing my ideas and opinions. The presentation aspect of the project was the most nerve racking. I felt prepared to engage with the audience to share my understanding of the novel with the task I had (literary luminary). I wish that I could've been more active and engaging with the discussion. I felt more confident after presenting and it has given me more confidence for future presentations such as spoken word. The critical thinking competency had a significant role in the process of our project. The whole idea was to analyse and investigate the literary devices Ray Bradbury was trying to communicate to the reader. Metaphors, satire, imagery and connections are all examples of literary devices that were analysed and explained in our presentation. We also questioned the audience to test their knowledge of the novel which demonstrates their and our understanding of the novel's thematic statements. We were assigned (pg.41-46). We were also required to design a visual aspect of the part. We chose to create a metaphor of the "hand that started it all". The drawing was a hand that was touching a book with text to show the knowledge and curiosity that's gained when reading. It demonstrates how a book could change your whole perspective of life and your surroundings.
